The DAILY ENTERPRISE thinks that there has been considerable unnecessary censure of the people of Orange because of their quarantine. They were at the most dangerous point in the State, and should that town have developed a suspicious case, they would have been bottled up as tight as Beaumont was last year. The editor of the DAILY ENTERPRISE does not like quarantines, but in the absence of a National quarantine law, properly enforced, he believes that the quarantine, as carried on in this State, is the proper thing. We are told that it is not yellow fever, but just the same, it kills people, and we notice that New Orleans promptly quarantined against other points until it was evident that it would be best for trade interests to establish communication between infected points. All this goes to prove that the people of Orange were only actuated by the same fears that all the people in the South have been moved by. If the Southern Pacific last year had only been allowed to have moved New York freight, the suspicious case we had in Beaumont would not have attracted attention, and there never would have been a case of yellow fever in Galveston or Houston, and Southeast Texas would have been hundreds of thousands of dollars better off. No doubt the people of Orange think that if a little quarantine is good, with whatever you may call it fever at Alexandria, that more quarantine is good with the same disease at Lake Charles, and the DAILY ENTERPRISE does not blame them. Only when we are bottled up ourselves on a case that is not yellow fever, do we propose to kick on quarantines imposed by other States or cities.
